

Breastfeeding As an Ecofeminist Issue

Written by Molly Remer, M.S.W., ICCE, CCCE

Friday, 01 March 2013 00:00 - Last Updated Tuesday, 30 July 2013 15:14

After Hurricane Katrina, I read a news story about a young mother whose newborn baby died of

Breastfeeding As an Ecofeminist Issue

Written by Molly Remer, M.S.W., ICCE, CCCE

Friday, 01 March 2013 00:00 - Last Updated Tuesday, 30 July 2013 15:14

© MAE BURKE / MAEBURKEPHOTOGRAPHY.COM

Breastfeeding As an Ecofeminist Issue

Written by Molly Remer, M.S.W., ICCE, CCCE

Friday, 01 March 2013 00:00 - Last Updated Tuesday, 30 July 2013 15:14

toward financial security in old age? And why do we enact social policies that subsidize child

Breastfeeding As an Ecofeminist Issue

Written by Molly Remer, M.S.W., ICCE, CCCE

Friday, 01 March 2013 00:00 - Last Updated Tuesday, 30 July 0:00 15:14

In western society, the baby gets attention while the mother is given lectures [emphasis mine]. Pregnancy is considered an illness; once the illness is over, interest in her wanes. Mothers in civilized countries often alone for themselves and the children. They are typically isolated socially and expected to complete their usual chores, including keeping the house clean and doing the cooking and shopping, while being the sole person in charge of the infant...

Breastfeeding As an Ecofeminist Issue

Written by Molly Remer, M.S.W., ICCE, CCCE

Breastfeeding As an Ecofeminist Issue

Written by Molly Remer, M.S.W., ICCE, CCCE

Friday, 01 March 2013 00:00 - Last Updated Tuesday, 30 July 2013 15:14
